

Top Official of CIA for 10 Yrs. Resigns Post

Herald Tribune News Service

WASHINGTON — A top official in the nation's global spy organization for the past 10 years is quietly leaving his post, it was learned Friday.

Robert Amory Jr., deputy director for intelligence of the Central Intelligence Agency, is resigning from the Central Intelligence Agency. However, he has accepted an offer from President Kennedy to join the Bureau of the Budget.

General Overhaul

The resignation of Amory, 47-year old former Harvard law professor, was seen here as related to the general re-vamping of the top echelon of the CIA by Mr. Kennedy. The President has been advised in this process by his brother, Atty. Gen. Kennedy.

The President has chosen John A. McCone, former Republican chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, as director of CIA to succeed Allen Dulles.

In rapid succession, the three other top officials of the CIA left the intelligence service.
